

Statement of participation

Anastasia Drozhanova

has completed the free course including any mandatory tests for:

Identity in question

This 12-hour free course explored how identity can be categorised, including in terms of gender, socio-economic categories, race and place of birth.

Issue date: 5 March 2023

www.open.edu/openlearn

This statement does not imply the award of credit points nor the conferment of a University Qualification.
This statement confirms that this free course and all mandatory tests were passed by the learner.

Please go to the course on OpenLearn for full details:

<https://www.open.edu/openlearn/society-politics-law/sociology/identity-question/content-section-0>

COURSE CODE: DD100_2

Identity in question

<https://www.open.edu/openlearn/society-politics-law/sociology/identity-question/content-section-0>

Course summary

Why is identity important and how are identities formed? This free course, Identity in question, looks at the many different ways in which identity can be categorised. By examining the requirements of the state, how a child views gender, and the importance of race or place of birth, you will start to understand how each individual can have more than one identity.

Learning outcomes

By completing this course, the learner should be able to:

- provide a definition of identity
- recognise how gender and socio-economic categories such as class can be used as a source of identity
- discuss social structures in terms of gender, class and nation.

Completed study

The learner has completed the following:

Section 1

Questions of identity

Section 2

Gender identity and gender development

Section 3

Identity, inequality and social class: what it is to be poor

Section 4

Where do you come from?

Section 5

Conclusion